correct, well formed thoughts into 140 characters poses a unique challenge, and the results aren't usually pretty.

To make matters worse, there are some words and terms that just flat out don't make sense at all. I'm not quite sure where they originate, but they permeate our younger generations and destroy the very fabric of the English language.

Here are some terms that make me just want to....

Turnt up!

What? Do you mean 'turned up'? If so...what's being turned up? The music volume? Are you 'turning up' somewhere? How can a person be "turnt up" ? Knock it off.

SMH

Seriously, cut this out right now. "Smh" is an acronym for "shaking my head," but it just looks ridiculous. I don't know about anyone else but I READ words, which means reading "smh" sounds like you just tried to hold in a sneeze. If you want to say you're shaking your head, then say it.

"Da" instead of The

Why? "I went to da store" ... uh, it sounds like you should go to da school and read da books. Is typing ONE less character really worth sacrificing your intellectual integrity? Sure, I say stuff like "you da man" to my friends all the time, but I don't substitute it for "the" in everyday speech.

"Hea" and "thea" instead of here and there.

My head hurts. As if the hardcore Boston accent wasn't bad enough, you've got to try to type it now? No.

I'm on one.

On one…what? Huh? Like, what does this even mean? You are not Drake.

Is it really that hard to just speak normal English? As this trend progresses, more and more members of the younger generation are going to think that this is the proper way to speak, and our future leaders are going to be in boardroom meetings talking about profits being "Turnt up" this quarter.

This is slang and should never be written down unless you're specifically trying to portray the accent of the speaker.

Yes it's slang/street speech, but probably derives from usage in immigrant communities in English-speaking countries, as many non-English native speakers have difficulty saying "th" in "the".

Native speakers who can say "th" often pick it up out of imitation, although in sometimes it's used through "laziness" of speech without outside influence.

TOP DEFINITION

Regional phrases known in Northern Michigan, used to express various sentiments and emotions.

Some examples of yooperisms are the phrases "Holy Wah" or "Yah hey der." Another example is the use of the word "da" instead of the common enlish form "the" infront of a word; ie. "da lake."
