 Ice refers to diamonds. If you have or wear ice then it be jewelry, usually rings, that have diamonds on them. Ices, plural, refers to multiple diamonds. So in the Black Eyed Peas song: My Humps, when she says, "They treat me really nice and buy me all these ices" She is saying that they treat her really nice and but her jewelry that has diamonds on it

Hip hop fan or not, you may not know about the more-than-just-lyrics site Rap Genius, a platform for crowdsourcing not the lyrics themselves, but something much more fun and useful: the meanings between the lines.

This is something that readers, especially close ones, are familiar with. We cross-reference, we notice when one book speaks to another, we look at exact word choices and why they were made, and in many cases, we know the layers are deep—often too deep for a single reader to reach through to any significant percentage of them on a single read. This can be especially important for poetry, where works that seem opaque without the right key suddenly open up to new meaning when a friend or teacher or a blogger shows you how to unlock them. How many of us would understand Wallace Steven's gorgeous and affecting "The Emperor of Ice-Cream" without knowing that in Key West, ice cream was traditionally served at funerals.

hey Frost, ice cream was traditionally served at funerals.

Hip hop, and especially rap, is arguably the widest reaching poetry of our time, and much of it bears similar study. Take a line from 2pac's (in)famous dis track, "Hit 'em Up." (Note: you will, I'm sure, be shocked to find that many links to Rap Genius are not exactly family-friendly.) "It's like a Sherm-high," 2pac raps, and the Rap Genius crowd informs the less-versed-in-such-matters that this refers to PCP, a drug known for making users "think they learned to fly. But they burn...you deserve to die." And here 2pac adds a truly literary element to a rough, nasty gangsta rap song: it's a reference to the story of Icarus, a level above a basic dis.

Rap is also huge on wordplay, and without significant background, it can be easy to miss. On Lil Wayne's "6 Foot 7 Foot," he raps, "I got through that sentence like a subject and a predicate." On a basic level, this can refer back to his previous line and the simple fact that it was a sentence. A note from the community informs as well that "Weezy did his jail sentence and is now back spitting flames"; a subject and a predicate is how you get through a grammatical sentence, and for Wayne, it can also be how you get through a prison term.

In Nicki Minaj's "Come on a Cone", there's a clear surface meaning—also involving some minor wordplay—in the main line of the hook: "I his ice is so cold, it should come on a cone." While just about everyone knows at this point that "ice" refers to diamonds, the previous line is more interesting. "Got the certification, cause it come with the stone" refers, again pretty clearly, to certified diamonds, but also, according to community contributions, "It's...a reference to the RIAA certification for album and single sales: gold (500K), platinum (1M), multi-platinum (2M+), and diamond (10M+)." (One of Minaj's earlier, mix-tape releases, "Itty Bitty Piggy," is also full of literary references, though relatively transparent ones to fairy tale or nursery rhyme characters: Rapunzel, Snow White, and the title piggy in the market.)

Rappers' sobriquets can have meaning in themselves, of course. Jay-Z often goes by J-Hova and variations on the name. Don't feel bad if you didn't realize this was a reference to Jehovah, and Jay-Z calling himself, on some level, a god (it took me far too long to get this). And it's a vital part of one of Minaj's cleverest hooks, in my opinion, from "HOV Lane":

I'm in the HOV lane
I'm in the HOV lane
(And you, y-you, y-you? Soul Train)

Kids Should Read Whatever They Want Whenever They Want

How much does Minaj pack into this—helpfully unpacked by Rap Genius commentators? Many readings are possible, all at once. The reference to Jay-Z suggests that not only is she simply driving in the HOV lane past all the folks stuck in traffic, but that her career path will not only lead her to be the goddess of rap, but to the kinds of business ventures that über-successful artists like Jay-Z have moved on to later in their careers. Her competitors, on the other hand, take the train. Other notes suggest a play on “soul” and “sole,” possibly referring to New York’s 1 train, a slower subway line, or simply the fact that her competitor is alone—and thus not in the literal HOV lane.

One of the great things about these comments is that they are truly social. Not everyone agrees on the meanings, new suggestions open up new possibilities, and the idea of looking for a “true” meaning as opposed to discovering the many “readings” available for these songs is taken seriously as commenters respond to each other and constantly explore new avenues of analysis. To be sure, a good portion of the comments simply clarify points of slang that may be unfamiliar, but the site also goes far beyond that.

Now, a crowdsourced close-reading platform for poetry and prose literature, doesn’t that sound fun?

Beyond The Certificate

While the 4c's of a GIA Diamond Grading Report are essential in understanding how a diamond's value is determined, many other factors not referenced on a diamond's certificate can have an even greater effect on a diamond's beauty and value. The following examples show some of these characteristics that the Aucoin family will evaluate when making their diamond selection.

TRANSPARENCY

A diamond's brilliance and beauty are directly related to its transparency. A diamond's transparency can be affected by fluorescence, inclusions, irregular and distorted crystal growth, or, most commonly, clouds (a cloud is a group of minute inclusions invisible to 10x magnification). Two diamonds with identical grading reports can have dramatically different levels of transparency and will therefore be valued quite differently. A diamond with poor transparency will look extremely milky or hazy and lack the crisp sharpness that is the Aucoin Hart diamond standard.

HUE

When most people think of a diamond's color, they think of the color grade as assigned by GIA. However, there is a different type of color that must be considered when buying a diamond. This is a diamond's hue. Some common hues that negatively affect a diamond's beauty are brown, grey, green, and off-white. These diamonds will appear dull and less lively. Since GIA does not make any special distinction between hues in color grades higher than K, their effect on a diamond's beauty can only be confirmed by visually inspecting a diamond.

BLACK INCLUSIONS

Even in higher VS clarities, black inclusions can contrast against a colorless diamond and distract the eye. Therefore, diamonds with black inclusions are rejected from any Aucoin Hart selection if they are centrally located or visibly noticeable to the unaided eye. As a GIA Grading Report will not note the color of a diamond's inclusion, a diamond buyer should visually inspect each diamond in person before purchasing.

Aucoin Hart's careful inclusion selections routinely make our diamonds with lower clarity grades more beautiful than other diamonds of a higher grade. Here's an example: If a VS2 diamond has a black center inclusion and our SI2 diamond is a scattered white inclusion off to the side, our diamond will be visually more appealing and, best of all, cost a fraction of the price.

REFLECTIONS

Just as a diamond's facets reflect light to create brilliance and fire, they can also reflect a diamond's inclusion to create multiple "mirrored" or "false inclusions" throughout a diamond. Since GIA does not plot the locations of these reflections, a diamond will look noticeably different from what a report indicates when its inclusions reflect. If a diamond's reflection adversely affects its beauty, it will be rejected from any Aucoin Hart selection.

DURABILITY

Certain types of inclusions can pose durability risks to a diamond even after it has been set. Examples are inclusions that are open to the surface or an inclusion located near a diamond's point. Only an experienced jeweler will be able to judge durability risks that can exist even in higher clarity grades. Aucoin Hart guarantees the durability of every Aucoin Hart diamond through normal wear for life.

FANCY SHAPES

A fancy shape diamond is any diamond that is not a round brilliant cut. Fancy shapes include cushion, princess, pear, oval, marquise and emerald cuts (see diamond shapes). There are many variations of each fancy shape that can cause two diamonds with nearly identical grading reports to look dramatically different in person (A GIA Grading report only approximates the shape of each diamond). The biggest differences will be seen in the unique shape or outline of each diamond, as well as differences in uniform brilliance. To truly evaluate the beauty of a fancy shaped diamond, a buyer should visually inspect and compare fancy shapes in person. Fancy shaped diamond, a buyer should visually inspect and compare fancy shapes in person. Fancy shapes that are routinely rejected from an Aucoin Hart selection include diamonds that do not possess a discernibly crisp facet pattern (sometimes called "cracked ice") or diamonds with pronounced light leakage (when light entering a diamond does not reflect back to the viewer's eyes it can create unattractive dark spots within the diamond that are sometimes called "bowties" or "windows"). Very few fancy shape diamonds available on the market will make the grade as an Aucoin Hart diamond.
