"my long review was lost with a crash, so I will sum it up nicely like this:-set up in 10 minutes, straight outa the box, in the dark, and I was 3 sheets to the wind.-ultralightweight for a 2person; I carry it as a solo tent, but was roomy enough for me and my dog (57 lbs)who slept ALL AROUND me through the night.-mesh construction breathes great; I can't imagine how someone has condensation complaints.-setup was a snap, but really MUST be on firm soil, not rock or loose soil in order to keep the tent taut. -concerning water resistance, the tent seems to be seam-taped and has a bathtub bottom, but the instructions in the box DO SAY that you should seal the seams...so I am waiting to set it up in the rain to see how water repellent it is.-I may buy a couple more just to have for friends or backups...at less than [$] a pop, who can beat that? Attached is a pic of the tent on the trail in the Ozarks, it's the one in the middle, surrounded by two tents that cost between [$] and [$]each...my alpine design weighs less, is roomier, and costs pennies in comparison."

"Have used this tent for about three trips, two of which turned out to be in bad weather. The first situation was that of gale force winds and the second was a night of continuous rain. Despite kicking myself for carrying the cheapo tent instead of the expensive one, this tent just kept working. It held up exceptionally well in the wind. It wasn't so great in the rain, but it was hard to say if it was condensation in the humid weather or rain that seeped through. Seams come sealed and the floor is pretty tough. Overall I'm impressed."

"I consider myself a seasoned outdoorsman with many miles on the trail. I have and still own several high end tents and know what I like. when I decided it was time for our Scouts to start packing, I struggled with having to tell them they would need to spend [$]for a reasonable pack tent. I came across this tent on sale for CHEAP! and reluctantly bought one. I used it myself that weekend on a 2 day hike just to shake it down a bit. I returned to the store that folowing monday and bought the 4 remaining and waited for the next sale. I just bought 6 more for our Scouts. this is no high end tent in comparison, but when they go on sale again I will get a couple more to complete our set. I outfitted 20 boys (2 per tent) with decent tents for less than I paid for 1 of mine! the first set of 4 have been on 4 trips, all 2 day trips, 1 with rain. they held up very well, a little condensation as reported, but no worse than most, including my personal high end tent. this is ideal for this use, has enough room for 2 boys, perfect for single large adult (I'm 6'4") lightweight and easy to set up. also as reported you do need a decent location for proper staking."

"Recently used this tent on a backpacking trip to Desolation Wilderness. Tent was set up in 15 minutes, broke down in the same amount of time. Was lightweight in my pack; my pack and I fit well on the inside. Encountered light showers, high wind, rain fly performed excellently. This tent needs to be staked well in order to hold its shape (as opposed to dome tents), so if you are not on appropriate soil, this tent will not perform well."

"This is actually a pretty good tent for what it is. I also bought it on sale and got a good deal. The rainfly is functional and goes all the way to the ground. The fabrics are cheap and the sewing is weak, but what do you expect for the price? The tent does have major condensation issues with no vent to let it out. I was OK by myself in 25 degrees, but the entire fly was coated in ice on the inside. If it had been 35 with another person in the rain, we would have gotten wet, not from leaking, but from condensation. I would have to be very friendly with that other person, two camping mats fit in the tent, but you have to overlap them at the feet. I could not sit up without touching the ceiling, but it wasn't overly cramped either.

This tent's greatest strengths are its price and weight. Get it on sale, they go on sale a lot. Immediately ditch the STEEL stakes that come with it, they weigh almost a pound by themselves. Get some aluminum gutter nails and you have a dirt cheap lightweight tent that should keep you pretty dry."

"Second time used was two nights three days camping. Rained both nights, first night hard. No water came in even a drip. Sealed very well. Easy to set up and lightweight. I am planning to get one more when it goes on sale. My backpack is 2800 cu and I put this tent vertically in the pack. I use it as solo tent and plenty of room when I sleep. Two things I don't like are not enough head room when I sit up and stakes came with the tent bent easily. I bought aluminum stakes and they work much better and held the fly tight.

At this price I cannot complain and I am happy with its performance. Highly recommend."

"It's pretty lightweight and VERY inexpensive. Big thumbs up for that. However, it is not freestanding, so you need to be on soil that can hold the stakes well. The material is pretty cheap and flimsy. I used it for only one night and had a ton of condensation on the inside (even without the rainfly on). Water was literally dripping on me. I would not trust this tent for any serious weather conditions or on a real backpacking trip. It's fine for car camping though."

"You must set it up on a hard ground not on the beach soil. It's so low every time I get up my head touches the top portion of this tent. It's funny when it is raining it doesn't drip inside but if it touches your hair every time you get up, your hair is wet also. Every time I move inside the stakes pull off from the ground so have a little careful when you moved inside. Nobody can beat the price."

"I found this tent impossible to set up well. it has to be staked down to stand. I had to buy a mallet to get stakes into hard california soil then used it near a beach in hawaii which was impossible as the stakes just came out of the sandy ground. The middle quickly sags bc staking problems make it hard to get enough tension. During my last trip the tent pole snapped due to some wind, going through the tent and the fly. I finally just tossed it instead of lugging it home. It did pack up well and stayed dry, no clammy condensation feeling in it. Overall I can't recommend this tent if you want something easy."
